Nowhere does it mention the fact that the Democratic Party also has a problem with white male voters (and all women voters). During the 2008 election, if there had been more of a competition for the votes of those under 35 (and female and non-white), the Democrats would have won by a landslide. It's not like these voters are leaving the Democratic Party en masse. They haven't yet. I've spent a few hours reading and watching the videos and interviews on the young lefty activism of the last few weeks and the problem is that most of them appear to be leaning more toward the Democrats. The Republican Party is not happy with the way the young are voting. If you look at the other videos you'll notice they all say they want young people to vote but they aren't afraid to put an ad out that tries to make young people look like idiots. The GOP is so worried about old white people that they aren't afraid to make videos showing the post-high school equivalents of America's idiot uncle in how they protest. The NYT piece doesn't mention any of this and it still hasn't found an answer to the problem of young male voters. I've read a bunch of other articles that have suggested the young Democrats are apathetic. How do the young overwhelmingly vote for President Obama while rarely voting for Senate races, for Congress, or state Senate and Assembly races, for the President of the Village of Caroga Lake? Do they know it's an election year? The message is you can be a young, college-educated, female with a job, no kids, a mortgage, and an SUV – but only if you vote Republican. The Democrats are not doing a good job of reaching young male voters and they haven't for the last 3 election cycles. Those who do vote are usually voting for Republicans. The GOP
